The Ancient Olympic Games

The Olympic games first started a long time ago in Greece. They were held once every four years in a city named Olympia. In the ancient Olympic games, they had some odd rules.

There was only one event, the 200-meter sprint. In this event, only men were allowed to run the race. Back then, the athletes had to clean the track themselves. They also had to cover their bodies with olive oil before the competition.

Then, over the years, other races and events were added. These events were boxing, wrestling, long jump, discus javelin throws, and chariot racing. Later, swimming, cycling, skiing, and many others were also included.

The winners in the ancient Olympic games didn't get any medals. Instead, they were given wreaths of olive leaves and treated like heroes.

They were also allowed to eat food for free and go to fun parties. In theatres, they used to get the best seats to watch plays. In addition, they were allowed to marry very rich women.

The Olympic games are still held once every four years, to this day. But the modern Olympics take place in different cities now. They also have very different rules, and the winners get medals.
